NOTE FROM THE EDITOR

Greetings, this morning's newsletter comes to you from a cross-country flight to Phoenix. I'm heading to WASTECON, where I'll be joined by Waste Dive's new reporter E.A. Crunden. We're both excited to hear about all the latest waste and recycling trends, catch up with acquaintances, and make new connections.

If you'll be at this year's event, and would like to meet, please email me at the address below. Stay tuned for our event coverage in the days ahead.

Virginia DEQ revokes Meridian landfill permit following repeated violations, escalating conflict

In an unusual move, state regulators have revoked a permit from Meridian subsidiary CFS after multiple complaints about the company's Tri-City landfill. An appeal is expected.

These 3 circular economy principles can help combat the climate crisis

Transitioning to a circular economy will take "concerted action from multiple stakeholders," according to a report from the Ellen MacArthur Foundation and Material Economics.

EPA sued by hazardous waste group over e-Manifest fee increases

The Environmental Technology Council, an industry trade association, is challenging the agency's "excessive" fee increase and seeking a refund. This follows ongoing complaints about the new tracking program's rollout.

Alabama ruling hits two landfills with ongoing environmental justice concerns

A ruling over alternative cover practices, which the state allowed, centers around sites run by Arrowhead Environmental Partners and Advanced Disposal Services. An appeal is considered likely.
