NWRA loses challenge to New York transfer station capacity law

The hard-fought "waste equity" law signed in 2018 will allow the city to restrict permitted capacity at sites in three different boroughs. Industry operators say it will unfairly harm their business and may appeal the decision.

New York commercial waste zone plan comes into focus with new draft

The latest bill language includes up to three companies per zone, future requirements for zero-emission trucks and new labor provisions. Supporters hope to pass it in a Oct. 30 council vote.

Federal court OKs Waste Pro workers' overtime, joint employment suit

The order could allow a jury to decide whether Waste Pro USA was a joint employer along with Waste Pro of Florida, Inc., and therefore liable for the alleged violations.

OPINION

3 reasons why M&A efforts fail

Companies conduct due diligence to discover why they shouldn't buy a company, but the mechanics of the process shouldn't kill deals. Unfortunately, that happens too often.
